118 Marketing Is a Standard Not a Message

Perspective Book · https://kb.jeffreysummers.com/docs/118-marketing-is-a-standard-not-a-message/

The message is what you say. The standard is what you do.

Every operator has a message. It lives on the website, in the social bio, in the tagline on the takeout menu. "Fresh ingredients. Friendly service. Your neighborhood restaurant." The message costs nothing to write and nothing to believe. It requires no architecture behind it and no accountability when the operation doesn't deliver it.

The standard is different. The standard is what happens at the host stand when a Guest walks in and nobody looks up. What happens at the table when the cast member recites the specials without making eye contact. What happens in the kitchen when the plate goes out wrong and the server decides whether to own it or ignore it. The standard is the operation's marketing — not what it says it is, but what it proves it is, shift after shift, in every interaction the Guest has with every person in the building.

Marketing is not a message. Marketing is a standard. Hold it everywhere.

Content Is the Residue

The operator who asks "how do I create better content?" is asking the wrong question.

Content is not created. It is produced — as the natural byproduct of an operation that is worth documenting. The bartender who has been there for years and knows the returning Guest's name before they sit down. The cast member who holds a difficult moment without flinching. The kitchen that runs clean at 7:45 on a Friday. Those are not content strategies. They are the operation. When the operation exists at that level, the content writes itself. When it does not, no amount of "authentic moments" will manufacture what isn't there.

The camera does not lie. It photographs the room. If the room has no heartbeat, the content is honest about that too.

Content is the residue of the operation — not the lever. The operator who invests in content before investing in the operation is photographing a building that has not earned the attention yet. The content will be technically competent and emotionally empty, and the Guest will feel that before they finish watching it.

Build the operation first. The content will find you.

Every Person on the Team Is a Marketer

Nobody on the cast has "marketing" in their job title. Every one of them is marketing the business every single shift.

The host who greets a Guest sets the tone for the entire visit. The server who reads the table correctly and adapts — who gives instead of takes — is producing the experience that becomes a review, a referral, a return visit. The cast member who keeps the kitchen running clean makes the plate possible. The vendor who delivers inconsistent product shows up on the plate. None of them are in the marketing department. All of them are the marketing department.

The data confirms what the operator already feels on a good shift. Brand messages reach 561% further when shared by employees than when shared through the brand's own channels. Not 61 percent. 561. The cast member who tells a friend about a shift that went right — about a Guest who left differently than they arrived, about a plate that landed exactly as intended — reaches an audience the operation's marketing budget cannot touch. And they reach it with something no ad can manufacture: credibility. They were there. (MSLGroup)

The operator who outsources their marketing to an agency while leaving the cast untrained, the host disengaged, and the kitchen inconsistent has not solved a marketing problem. They have decorated a standard problem with a marketing budget. The agency cannot fix what is happening on the floor. Only the standard can.

Marketing is not a department. It is a standard. And the standard is held — or not held — by every person in the building, on every shift, whether the marketing agency is watching or not.

The Transparency Problem

When the operator hires a marketing firm, a social media agency, or a media buyer, one question has to be asked before the contract is signed: how does this firm get paid, and what behavior does that payment structure reward?

The vendor who earns a commission on what they place with your budget has a different incentive than the vendor who earns a flat fee for the outcome. The commission structure rewards spend. The flat fee rewards results. Those are not the same thing — and in many cases they produce directly opposite behavior. The firm that earns 15% of media spend has a financial incentive to spend more of your money whether or not the spend is producing results. Ask. Before you sign. Name the structure. Confirm the incentive aligns with what you actually need.

This is not a cynical position. Most marketing vendors are honest. The structure is still the question — because an honest vendor operating inside a commission structure is still being pulled toward a behavior the operator does not want. The transparency problem is not about intent. It is about architecture. The same principle the book applies to every other system in the operation applies here: the architecture produces the behavior, regardless of the person inside it.

Hire for the outcome. Pay for the outcome. Ask how the vendor gets paid when they don't deliver one.

Marketing Isn't a Department. It's a Standard.

The operator who manages marketing as a line item — a budget that gets allocated, a vendor that gets hired, a campaign that gets launched — is running marketing as a department. The department has a budget. The budget has a ROI. The ROI either justifies the next spend or it doesn't.

That is not wrong. It is incomplete.

The operator who manages marketing as a standard — who holds every person in the building to the standard that the marketing promises, who reads the reviews as a report on whether the standard held, who measures marketing ROI not just in clicks and covers but in return rate and relationship depth — is running marketing as the discipline it actually is.

The message is what you say you are. The standard is what you prove you are, every shift, to every Guest, through every person in the building. When the two match, the marketing works. When they don't, no campaign closes the gap.

Build the standard first. Then say what it is.

What Changes Tomorrow

Identify one marketing claim your operation is currently making — on your website, your social, your menu, anywhere — that the standard is not consistently delivering. That gap is not a marketing problem. It is a standard problem wearing a marketing budget. Fix the standard. Then the claim becomes true. Then the marketing works.
