The Demand

Before tomorrow's shift, name the one Read you're going to build deliberately rather than absorb passively — a Guest comment, a cast observation, a number that moved. Run it, name the decision it points to, pass it through a real gate before you act, act at the speed the read demands, and then read the result instead of assuming you know it. That is one lap of the loop. Run it once, on purpose, and you'll feel the difference between compounding and coasting.

The Work

Run one lap of the loop on a real read from your operation right now:
Beat 1 — The Read you are building deliberately (a Guest comment, a cast observation, a number that moved):
Beat 2 — Where you ran it (the floor, the kitchen, the numbers) and what you saw:
Beat 3 — Name the decision this read points to, in one sentence:
Beat 4 — The gate you passed it through before acting (who or what challenged it):
Beat 5 — The action you took, and the speed it demanded:
Beat 6 — The result you read afterward, instead of assuming you already knew it:
What compounded because you ran this loop on purpose instead of coasting:
